BIG THOUGHT

Did this feel like the longest January ever? Between nonstop geopolitical headlines, market volatility and even the extreme cold and snow in parts of the country not accustomed to it, most were ready to turn the calendar. Importantly beyond all of that there were positives for financial markets. Top of the list is earnings season, which has been mostly strong. In fact, earnings for the broader market are expected to grow double digits this year. Should that prove true it should be a tailwind for stocks, but not without potential volatility as described on the next page. It is beginning to feel like more than just a short-term event as international, small caps, value, commodities and other long neglected investments perform well. This broadening of the market is another positive that frankly we had hoped to see for years now. In addition to those broad investment opportunities, we are also adding new investments in healthcare, while continuing to believe in the long-term impact of AI. Lastly, we are excited to be launching a new quantitative based stock portfolio. Please reach out to your advisor for additional information.

CHART OF THE MONTH

Historically February has been the second worst month of the year for stocks. Dating back to 1928 it has averaged a slightly negative return and is only positive about half of the years. Of course, at any given time there are many factors impacting financial markets and seasonal tendencies are well down the list of importance. What if there is a correction this month, or anytime this year? Consider that in each of the past three years the S&P 500 had intra-year declines of 8-19% and yet each year finished with double digit gains.
